The National Alliance for Caregiving Releases a New White Paper Analyzing Existing Incentives for Caregiver Services

Caregivers are not well integrated into U.S. healthcare systems. Across care settings, caregivers lack formal and consistent roles on the care receiver's care team and can struggle to manage their care recipient's needs with their own. Only 29 percent of caregivers report being asked by a healthcare professional about their caregiving needs; this rate drops to 13 percent when the question referred to what the caregiver needed to be able to care for themselves (2020 Report of Caregiving in the U.S.; AARP and National Alliance for Caregiving).

As discussed in a new white paper published by NAC, no single solution that can address this complex area of need. Variations in payment models, insurance coverages, healthcare settings, and types of provider challenge innovators to generate flexible solutions. Emerging models of caregiver support show promise that integrating caregivers more fully not only benefits caregivers, but may improve patient outcomes.

Invisible Until the Pandemic, Family Caregivers are Now on the Front Lines

For more than 30 years I've advocated for our nation's family caregivers, a cause borne from my own experiences caring for loved ones. I have long known that they have not received the acknowledgment and support they deserve. One of the many sobering lessons of the current pandemic is that our nation's family caregivers must be neglected no longer. Even before COVID, they numbered an estimated 53 million and millions more have been added to their ranks as the virus has spread across our country. They represent the front lines of care for their loved ones, yet their enormous contributions have remained virtually invisible to policymakers, politicians and health care professionals alike.

Research shows that family caregivers are at increased risk of poor health and financial insecurity. They often struggle on behalf of their care recipient to navigate a cumbersome health care system that rarely acknowledges their role, and there are indications that less than 10 percent of caregivers get any services at all. The pandemic has only exacerbated their predicament.

Do Caregivers Really Need a Month of Their Own?

November is National Family Caregivers Month. Who knew?

It's not like the greeting card aisle is overrun with cards wishing that special someone in your life a Happy Caregivers Month. Most caregivers won't get a dozen roses delivered to their doorstep. And don't look for lawn signs announcing that "A Family Caregiver Lives Here." I have yet to see one.

National Family Caregivers Month, I'm afraid, falls into that category of overlooked events that includes National Celery Month (March), National Accordion Awareness Month (June) and Spunky Old Broads Month (February). Events that come and go without landing on anyone's radar.

But why?

Based on sheer numbers alone – 53

Apps On Your Phone Can Improve Caregiver Mental Health

Those who care for older adults suffering with memory loss and other cognitive impairments can significantly reduce their depression, stress, and anxiety by focusing on what is going on at the moment and engaging in mindfulness therapy, according to new Rutgers research.

The study, published in Aging & Mental Health, examined the feasibility, acceptability, and usefulness of Mindfulness Coach, a mobile application designed to teach people how to practice mindfulness.

"Caregiving can be extremely stressful and time consuming. Caregivers don't always have time to seek out the services that they may need, like therapy," said Elissa Kozlov, instructor in the Department of Health Behavior, Society, and Policy at the Rutgers School of Public Health. "However, our study has

There are 23 million working caregivers in this country.

One in six working Americans provides unpaid care to a family member or friend with a chronic, serious, or disabling health condition. Cancer researcher Shivapriya Ramaswamy counts herself among the privileged minority in this significant, but historically marginalized, group.

Employed by a Fortune 500 pharmaceutical in the Boston Area, Ramaswamy has a steady salary and access to copious caregiver-friendly benefits, among them paid family medical leave, backup elder care, assistance referral services, and flexible work arrangements.

Yet, during the four years that Ramaswamy lived with and cared for both her aging parents, she made little use of what was on offer. "It took time I didn't have to go over what was available... and going to HR for help felt too public and impersonal," she says. Though she desperately wanted a more flexible schedule, she never considered asking. "I had colleagues who worked some days from home.

I'd find myself staring at my computer screen, unable to think at work, partially because I was exhausted and partly because I was so worried about what was going on at home.

They were seen as less committed," she says. "I couldn't afford that stigma."

So Ramaswamy—like many of the 23 million working caregivers in this country—stretched herself until she nearly snapped. "I'd find myself staring at my computer screen, unable to think at work, partially because I was exhausted and partly because I was so worried about what was going on at home," she says. "I know that I brought some of this on myself. But the truth is I didn't feel comfortable discussing my caregiving issues at work and never thought of my employer as a solution to my problems."

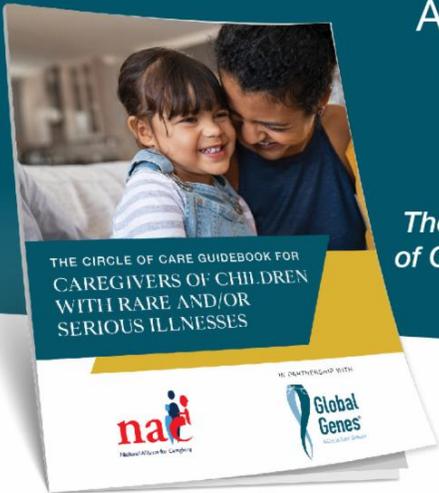

Ramaswamy is, indeed, among the most privileged working caregivers in this country. Still, her story illustrates many of the issues that have generally stood between caregivers and the

Lessons from the Workplace: Caregiving During COVID-19

In the first article of its new Spotlight series, Social Innovations in Caregiving, the National Alliance for Caregiving details the hardships the COVID-19 crisis magnified for millions of working caregivers and explores the mismatch between what family caregivers need to meet the demands of working while caregiving and what benefits and supports employers offer. "The pandemic has exposed the reality that working Americans must too often choose between caring for loved ones and holding onto their jobs," says Grace Whiting, President, and CEO of NAC.

Offering potential solutions on how employers can address this mismatch, NAC advances recommendations for workplace policies and practices that employers can provide to caregivers. These recommendations include flextime, compressed workweeks, and public policy strategies to help reinforce workplace solutions such as redefined paid leave criteria.

NAC's Circle of Care Guidebook for Caregivers of Children with Rare and/or Serious Illnesses

The National Alliance for Caregiving recently produced The Circle of Care Guidebook for Caregivers of Children with Rare and/or Serious Illnesses, resource designed in partnership with Global Genes and with support by Mallinckrodt Pharmaceuticals to provide caregivers with the support, services and specialized information they need to care for a child with a rare and/or serious illness. This guidebook offers an extensive list of resources to help a caregiver in any situation throughout the entirety of their journey as a rare disease caregiver, compiled by those in the rare disease space and caregivers themselves. This list is supplemented by the specialized information needed in order to care for a child with a rare and/or serious illness. If you or someone you know cares for a child living with a rare and/or serious illness, make sure to check out the guidebook at the link below.

You'll learn about:

- The process of getting an accurate diagnosis for a rare and/or serious illness;
- Genetic testing, clinical trials and support groups that can help;
- Information on treatment and care coordination with specialized teams;
- Understanding the cost of care and treatment;
- Advocating for your child, their care and in their disease space;
- Empowering your child to manage their rare and/or serious illness through all aspects of their life, including when they become an adult; and
- Caring for yourself and your family.

There is also an appendix with a comprehensive list of online resources, supports and services for caregivers, the child living with the rare and/or serious illness, and his or her family that are referenced throughout the guidebook.

What's Public Health Got To Do With... Family Caregiving?

Trust for America's Health (TFAH) has published a blog, "What's Public Health Got To Do With... Family Caregiving?," to launch its new monthly blog series on Age-Friendly Public Health Systems. This series is designed to stir up conversation, generate interest, and challenge healthy aging stakeholders to engage more deeply in age-friendly public health issues.

Author of this month's blog on "What's Public Health Got To Do With... Family Caregiving?," Megan Wolfe, TFAH's Senior Policy Development Manager, outlines five potential roles for public health departments to support caregivers, organized according to TFAH's AFPHS 5Cs Framework. The roles include collecting and disseminating data, coordinating existing supports and services, connecting and convening multiple sectors, communicating, and complementing existing supports.

Home Is Where the Care Is

What if you were one of the 2 million adults who are homebound in the United States? Wouldn't you want care to come to you? With the nation's older adult population increasing, home-based primary care is quickly becoming the future of health care for patients who are medically complex. New resources share needed information about delivering primary care in the home:

- The Better Care Playbook's Home-Based Primary Care Collection provides research, resources and tools for delivering care at home. The collection includes blogs from Rush@Home detailing its care model elements and implementation insights, and the Department of Veterans Affairs highlighting its successful program.
- A Home Centered Care Institute (HCCI) House Calls 101 course offers a simulated educational experience to help you get started with home-based primary care.

Report: The United States Should Recognize and Support Caregiving Youth

In the United States, more than 5.4 million children and adolescents under age 18 provide care for family members who are aging or have chronic illness, disability, or other health conditions that require assistance.

In this policy study published in the Society for Research in Child Development's Social Policy Report, the authors describe youth's care for the family and highlight the increasing prevalence, global challenges, and uneven successes of measurement and categorization. They briefly summarize research on how caregiving affects youth's academic, social, and emotional well-being. Next, they present novel, emerging evidence from the public school-based 2019 Youth Risk Behavior Survey for the State of Florida, which suggests that as many as 24 percent of middle school students and 16 percent of high school students provide at least some care to the family on a regular basis. Drawing on this evidence, the authors' discuss targeted social programs which have been shown to promote the well-being of caregiving youth outside of the United States, as well as a 13-year-old school-based intervention in The School District of Palm Beach County, Florida.

The report concludes with specific recommendations for a path toward recognizing and supporting caregiving youth via policy and practice in the United States. Its aim is to increase the awareness and feasibility of identifying and supporting caregiving youth and their families via government-organized data collection and targeted social policies.
